A growing body of research has recognised a link between welfare states and the ecological modernization of a country (Koch & Fritz 2014; Zimmermann & Graziano 2020). Several new concepts such as "sustainable welfare", "eco-social welfare" and "eco-welfare states" have been created to reflect the existing intersection between social and environmental policies (Hirvilammi & Koch 2020). However, little is still known on the conditions and the mechanisms that enhance the achievement of high eco-social performances in the EU member states and conduct to sustainable welfare states. This series of seminars aims to spark a discussion on key features of the eco-social dimension of public policies from a theoretical and practical point of view through the participation of academics, practitioners and students. The seminar series comprises of two broad sessions each with three events co-organized by Cà Foscari University and the University of Padua. In the Fall session, we will discuss critical topics such as the European public views on eco-welfare, the nexus between EU's climate change and redistribution policies, as well as the European Green Deal. In the Spring session, we will explore the eco-social dimension of recently adopted European policies and their implementation in the EU member States, as well as that of human well-being in connection with global problems such as climate change. Gli incontri si terranno in lingua inglese.
